The Brigadier of Ice

Five months ago, Lady Carrie Wickfield married His Grace, Brigadier Harold Lance, Duke of Homne. The day after the wedding, he left Castle Homne. She hasn't seen him since. She spends her days in the library, losing herself in the past, and pondering the knowledge that only she is aware of. The Duke is a broken man, and his laughter and ballroom smiles are part of a façade to hide his pain.

When he returns after his long absence, Carrie expects his coldness to continue. But, to her surprise, he begins to open up to her. They walk the gardens, share meals, learn each other's bodies. She starts to learn that Harold is even more vulnerable beneath his muscular, ice-blue-eyed exterior than she thought. She sets herself the task of soothing his broken heart.

Can she close the gap between them? Can she melt the ice that surrounds her husband?

The Brigadier's Wallflower

Miss Eve Somerset has no dowry, no father, and no prospects. It is her third season, and she is still unmarried. She is the girl at the party with whom nobody wishes to dance. She is a wallflower. Pushed on by her mother, Mrs. Mary Somerset, and a cantankerous Aunt, Miss Alice Wilton, Eve finds herself at a ball hosted by the His Grace, the Duke of Somerset. After all, even wallflowers must attend balls. But her hopes of finding a suitor are low, and she joins the other poor, neglected girls at the end of the hall.

Then enters Brigadier Charles Appleyard, veteran of Waterloo who has taken a long break from polite society. He is distinguished by a long, rough scar that covers half his face and blinds one eye. Many flinch at the sight of him, many think him ugly, but Eve finds him irresistibly interesting.

Perhaps the wallflower can save the Brigadier; perhaps the Brigadier can save the wallflower.
