The God's Children is a dark and haunting tale of romance, revenge, and long-buried family secrets. It is 1957 in the southern Midwest, where poverty has grown in an extreme way. In this coming of age story, an eight-year-old girl named Rijeka struggles with bullying, while coping with dysfunctional members of her family. Through a shaming experience at school, she learns that her family is one of the least respected in town.

She refuses to be defined by her family's background, or by persons so obsessed with judging who and what she can become. She is influenced by an author of children's books, and dreams of someday writing novels. She finds that there are many roads open to her, but just as many others are blocked. Through studying and working hard in school, she plans her escape from the restrictions, categories, and definitions which others have assigned to her because of gender, the circumstances into which she was born, or any limitation.

Focused on ambitions, the last thing Rijeka expects is to fall for a handsome young man who has probably dated every woman in town except her. After graduating from high school, her world is once again turned upside down by a love at first sight attraction for an older man.

Rijeka learns that the power of love, courage, and friendship carries her through the struggles of loss and betrayal. She wonders what in her indefinitely open future will bring her lasting fulfillment? Oh, that magical feeling of being in love! But can she be in a committed relationship without it eventually breaking down into a state of dependency? Does a woman measure her success, individuality, and fortune in life through happiness and love, or through liberty? She is searching for a way to have it all.
